"I have some bitter disappointments as President," reflected Harry Truman after leaving office, "but the one that has troubled me the most in a personal way, has been the failure to defeat organized opposition to a national compulsory health-insurance program."

"This volume challenges those who are labeled 'New Left' historians because of their attacks on Truman's domestic conservatism, by maintaining that his proposals in the area of national health care were far ahead of their time and were, indeed, actually 'radical.' . . . This well-written book fills a void in the historiography of the Truman administration, for no other monograph has addressed itself to this timely subject."--Choice
